there was no indication of the presence of a submarine net or mine field at the entrance of Bukhta Nakhedka, but curious as to why they had to follow range lights to gain entrance to such a well-lighted and unencumbered harbor. It was possibly due to unfamiliarity with the harbor on the part of the pilot. the pilotage seemed to be rather poor and quite slow. The handling was also poor, and there was apparently only one tug available to moor vessels.

customs, immigration and health officials met at berth. Inspection and search by all three departments were cursory, and only the radio room was sealed. There were no restrictions on the crew's possession of currency, cigarettes or liquor. Also, the crew was informed there would be no restriction on cameras or picture-taking while in Nakhodka. Accordingly, the vessel's third officer took 360 degrees around the harbor from the vessel's bridge as she lay alongside in her berth. (See paragraph #18 below.)

5. Security while at Nakhodka consisted of one armed guard of the Soviet Army at the foot of the Fernhurst's gangway. He wore a grey-green uniform with an overseas-type cap. Each member of the vessel's crew was issued a pass by the Soviet boarding party and was able to leave and board ship merely by showing this pass to the gangway guard. After passing this guard there were no further restrictions on the crew members' wanderings. All passes were collected when the vessel departed Nakhodka

As shown in the overlay There is one set of standard gauge track extending the full length of the wharf (#5 on the overlay), and the vessel's lead of grain was discharged into 50-ten cars. Discharging was accomplished by lifts with six-feet by eight-and-a-half feet "grabs" on seven-ton capacity cranes. Unloading was carried on around the clock and the freight cars were moved about by small steam shunting engines. Each of the vessel's hatches was manned by a crew of ten men, with two women sweeping down the entire dock alongside periodically.

12 cranes along the wharf, of the type that were used to unload his ship.

7. Across the wharf was a series of similarly constructed buildings running its full length (#6 on overlay were purely storage sheds. Behind these buildings (#7 on overlay), a great both women were school teachers, teaching mainly English in Nakhodka, but that they were originally from the European
